Patcham is it's own large ward and needs to stay that way. There are separate schools providing the areas. There are major roads dividing it naturally from Westdene and other neighbouring wards. Patcham needs its own representation to fight and prevent the constant plans to build on it. Patcham is it's own community getting along well with its neighbours, it's history and identity is import to the city and there is no purpose in merging it with westdene or any other ward. The existing wards gives resident security in an ever expanding and overpopulated city. Patcham remains a large mainly working class family community and would have no fair representation against a more affluent area. Patcham is an area of Brighton which people born and bread in Brighton can just about afford to live. This does not necessarily apply to other wards in the city. Merging Patcham would be a catastrophic mistake and would be resisted and would just result in the people of Patcham being unserved and forgotten.
