It seems bizarre, bordering on egregious, to essentially decimate Patcham in the new ward proposals. Not only will this limit council representation for Patcham, it puts about 85% of it into Hollingbury, including schools and churches affixed with Patcham in their name. It appears the consultations have not had anyone from Patcham involved, and I cannot think of why anyone would agree to these strange ward proposals. While I am sympathetic to council limitations, particularly under the current government, these proposals only appear to lessen representation for those in Patcham and across the boundaries, which would be a worrying development for Brighton. The prior draft proposals are more understandable, whereas the further ones do not, in my opinion, make any sense. I wholeheartedly disagree with the further plans.
