I am not convinced that it is a good idea to break up larger areas into smaller ones where this reduces the number of councillors with a remit to deal with local relevant matters. A problem with our political system is that it can be very difficult to persuade a representative of a particular persuasion to pay serious attention to the views of someone of a different persuasion. The advantage of larger multi-member arrangements is that it becomes more likely that it is possible for everyone to find a more sympathetic ear. This must surely have the advantage of heightening confidence in democracy as nothing is more depressing to a constituent than being forced into saying that no-one will listen to me.
